Your grandfather has hired you in his bean factory in the hopes of someday giving the multi-billion dollar company to you. But before you are given such a big responsibility, you have to first do the dirty work. You are a bean counter. Your job is to check the beans that are leaving the factory and report back to your grandfather. Because you want to impress him, you will be giving him this information in three different ways.

With your given sample of beans, you must communicate the amounts of each bean in three different ways. There are no official names for the beans, so you must name each bean in a way that your grandfather will understand.

You may work with other bean counters, but each counter must submit their own reports. Use the space below for jotting notes, outlining plans, or other work. Your reports can be in any format you want, as long as your teacher can understand them. If you have any questions, just ask!
